article_55915_e9e4a5cdda2cef4a7812eb6e0040fd2?forum=pregnology Which vein should be used to transfer the embryo? Dr. Zeisler (Pregnancy Advisor)Tue, 14 May 2016 01:50:57 ESTI want to transfer the embryo to the left fallopian tube, my doctor wants to transfer the embryo to the right fallopian tube. Which vein should be used to transfer the embryo? Please help me!Fri, 10 May 2016 20:35:02 ESTI have a 9+ month old girl and my first baby, and I want a second baby. My OBGYN has been saying I have issues with my ovary and can't get pregnant. I have been to two specialists and my blood work is fine. I have always been able to get pregnant in the past. She wants me to have my tubes checked, but I am not interested in having any surgery done for fertility. Should I wait until I have my next period to get the tubes checked? I am really interested in starting a family but i am having trouble conceiving. I have recently just discovered i have PCOS after 4 1/2 years. I am very hopeful but i also have the fear of getting pregnant! I am a 41 year old nurse. I have recently had my tubes tied after 2 years of trying. I had been trying with a different partner as well. We have been trying for 2 years. I have tried fusing sperm from my husband to a donor's egg. We have had 3 failures on frozen embryos. I am afraid of waiting because I have had problems with my heart and it makes me very anxious. I am trying to have my tubes tied in the fall. My husband and I have been married for 12 years and I have been trying for 5 years. I was on Clomid, Femhrin-D, Percodan and Percocet. It took over a year to conceive. We ended up having 7 IUI's and 2 frozen embryos. After all that, we had my first successful cycle in October. I was in menopause and since then I have been advised by my doctors to get a hysterectomy. I have been off birth control since November. I am now 5 months pregnant. My doctor says that I have polycystic ovarian syndrome (PCOS). Can you please help me to understand what
